Liquid investigations Project is funded by Google's DNI, led by the Romanian Journalism Investigation Center (CRJI), in which web developers and journalists strive to make investigative collaborations less burdensome and safer. The aim of the project is to provide investigative journalists with an open, secure and integrated environment to allow distributed and liquid collaboration on journalistic projects.

Journalists need new systems to facilitate their collaborative work to enable them to search, analyse, and share their work in a secure and integrated work. That’s why, the kit will allow for distributed, non-hierarchical data analysis, sharing, information exchange while giving network members distributed and granular control over data management.

Liquid investigations is an open source project

The Digital News Initiative (DNI) is a partnership between Google and news publishers in Europe to support high quality journalism through technology and innovation. Their goal is to encourage a more sustainable news ecosystem while promoting innovation in digital journalism through ongoing collaboration and dialogue between tech and news sector.

Because Google is supporting and stimulating innovation in digital news journalism over the next three years by creating an innovation fund, Google is investing in new training and development resources for journalists and newsrooms across Europe, and funding research into the changing media landscape.

We are proud to work on this project because we believe that the work of journalists can be sustained and facilitated with the help of technology. Collaboration is essential, which is why we are convinced that this project will create new bridges at the international level.

We know that it’s not easy to build a successful project by yourself, and that if you care you must help. Experience has shown that teamwork with trained people is the key step in developing a project.

Because we like to help people who want to succeed, but lack the support, we offer the opportunity to present us their idea and work with them to achieve their goal. Once a year, we choose the best idea and work to accomplish it. We help with counseling, copywriting, ideas, strategy and site development.

Soon, this year’s pro bono project will be up.
Thank you
